USD/JPY: What to expect from Jackson Hole

24 August 2026

(Original Japanese report issued on 21 August 2026 at 17 pm Tokyo time.)

The JPY Weekly will not be published on 31 August 2026.

The next issue is scheduled for publication on 7 September 2026.

Week in review

The USD/JPY opened the week at 159.19. The pair slipped below 159 during Tokyo and European trading on 17 August before reversing course as US economic data improved and oil prices rose. It continued to edge higher the following day, reaching a high of 159.78. The pair subsequently struggled to extend gains as 160 emerged as a psychological resistance level amid continued caution over possible intervention by the Japanese authorities. It gradually fell back toward 159 during Tokyo trading on 19 August before the US Treasury announced plans to expand UST buybacks from September. The announcement triggered broad-based dollar selling, pushing the USD/JPY to a low of 158.03 early in Tokyo trading on 20 August. The pair avoided a break below 158 and rebounded as UST yields recovered, returning to above 159 and erasing the previous day's decline. However, it was top-heavy around 159 at the time of writing on 21 August (Figure 1). The dollar weakened against the major currencies this week, partly in response to the US Treasury announcement. The yen also weakened broadly outside the USD/JPY, with EUR/JPY rising above 185 for the first time since 31 July (Figure 2).

US Treasury steps up bond buybacks

The US Treasury announced on 19 August that it would double the size of its buybacks of long and superlong dated USTs from 9 September through 4 November. UST yields fell sharply after the announcement but had largely returned to their previous levels by 20 August, suggesting that the initial market reaction had run its course. However, Treasury Secretary Scott Bessent said that the administration will announce "an increased focus on fiscal consolidation" as early as this weekend or next week, raising the possibility of further measures to restrain long-term yields. Coming after intervention in the FX market at the end of July, the move also signals the administration's willingness to act directly in the bond market. Markets will need to remain alert to what comes next, including any action by the Japanese government following its cooperation with the US on FX intervention. New economic sanctions on Iran due to be announced on 24 August are also likely to draw attention. President Donald Trump has warned that countries supporting Iran could also face measures, creating another potential source of volatility across financial markets.

What will Fed Chair Warsh signal?

We expect attention will turn to the annual Jackson Hole symposium in the latter half of next week. Minutes of the July FOMC meeting released on 19 August showed that many participants believed a rate hike would be necessary if inflation failed to slow. However, expectations of a September rate hike have declined after a run of softer US data this month, including the employment report, CPI, and retail sales. The focus will therefore be on what Fed Chair Kevin Warsh chooses to say when he speaks on 28 August. The Treasury's recent moves in the bond market have added another complication. Given Warsh's approach to communication so far, he may provide even fewer clues on near-term monetary policy than markets currently expect. It would also be unwise to assume that Treasury Secretary Bessent, who coordinated with the Japanese government on FX intervention, is acting independently of Warsh. Depending on Warsh's message, and how markets interpret it, his speech could once again heighten tensions in bond and FX markets.

BOJ unlikely to push back against rate-hike expectations

Expectations of a rate hike at the BOJ's September meeting have risen to around 80%, helped by reports late last week and the recent rise in oil prices. Markets are also pricing in around a 50% chance of two hikes by year-end, but such expectations have not translated directly into yen buying. July CPI released on 21 August showed that inflation accelerated from the previous month despite downward pressure from rice prices, reinforcing expectations that inflation will rise further. Long- and superlong-term yields also remain under upward pressure amid a stream of reports about next fiscal year's budget under the government's expansionary fiscal policy and speculation over a Cabinet reshuffle as early as next month. The Nikkei 225 has also struggled to move higher. With Japanese assets facing these headwinds, the yen has actually weakened against currencies other than the dollar. At the time of writing, there has been no announcement that BOJ Governor Kazuo Ueda will attend the Jackson Hole symposium. However, Deputy Governor Ryozi Himino will speak at a meeting with local leaders on 27 August. The BOJ would presumably seek to correct market expectations if it believed investors were wrong to price in an 80% probability of a September hike. However, pushing back against those expectations could provide a fresh catalyst for yen weakness at a time when intervention concerns have kept the USD/JPY just below 160. That would be difficult to reconcile with the BOJ's recent focus on the risk that a weaker yen could push consumer inflation higher through rising import prices. From this perspective, the recent increase in rate-hike expectations may reflect pressure from the market for the BOJ to act rather than the result of the BOJ's own communication. This may also explain why those expectations have failed to prompt yen buying. As the BOJ steps up its communication with markets from next week, the focus will be on how it shapes expectations beyond the September meeting. However, excessive expectations could ultimately set the stage for disappointment. We see near-term risk as skewed toward yen weakness given that rate-hike expectations have already risen substantially.

Forecast range

USD/JPY: 157.00 ~ 161.00
