USD/JPY: Will there be a third intervention?

7 September 2026

(Original Japanese report issued on 4 September 2026 at 17 pm Tokyo time.)

The JPY Weekly will not be published next week.

Week in review

The USD/JPY opened the week at 160.11. Yen buying dominated from the start of the week, pushing the pair below 160. Treasury Secretary Scott Bessent then held a series of meetings with Finance Minister Satsuki Katayama and BOJ Governor Kazuo Ueda on the sidelines of the G20 meeting. Bessent's comment that he was confident the Japanese authorities would take steps that would lead to a stronger yen also weighed on the pair, which struggled to move higher above 159.50. The USD/JPY recovered above 160 on 1 September as the 10y JGB yield reached 3% and rose to a high of 160.39 early on 2 September. Yen buying then resumed after BOJ policy board member Hajime Takata referred to the size of future rate hikes, sending the pair sharply lower to around 158 during US trading that day. The decline continued during Tokyo trading on 3 September, with the pair falling intermittently to around 155.50. It briefly slipped further to below 155.50 at the time of writing on 4 September (Figure 1). The yen strengthened across the board this week. The dollar softened as expectations of further Fed rate hikes receded, while the New Zealand dollar was sold into its rebound following the RBNZ's rate hike (Figure 2).

Several factors converge to support yen strength

The USD/JPY fell by around 5 yen over the two trading days of 2 and 3 September, broadly matching the scale of the moves seen around the FX intervention that began at the end of April. However, the BOJ's projections for changes in current account balances showed no sign that intervention had taken place on 2 September, at least. Instead, various reports suggest that overseas investors became more active during this period and stepped up yen buying. The options market tells a similar story. USD/JPY risk reversals moved sharply further into negative territory, pointing to a surge in demand for yen calls. In hindsight, the catalyst for this yen buying appears to have been stronger expectations of BOJ rate hikes. Treasury Secretary Bessent said he expected Governor Ueda to "do the right thing" with Prime Minister Sanae

Takaichi's support. Bessent also met separately with Finance Minister Katayama and Governor Ueda, while after the G20 Ueda said that the BOJ would discuss a rate hike at every meeting, including the next one. Against this backdrop, BOJ policy board member Hajime Takata gave the market a further reason to buy the yen at his meeting with local business leaders on 2 September. He said the BOJ needed to respond nimbly without being constrained by the intervals between rate hikes or the size of moves currently assumed by the market. This prompted investors to consider not only a faster pace of rate hikes, but also the possibility of larger individual increases. Expectations of a September hike had already risen substantially since the Japan-US coordinated intervention and were increasingly reflected in bond markets, but had done little to support the yen. The latest move may therefore represent a rapid catch-up in the FX market.

Attention will next turn to remarks from BOJ policy board member Kazuyuki Masu on 11 September. At meetings with local business leaders in February and May, Masu repeatedly stressed that timely and appropriate rate hikes would be needed to prevent underlying inflation from rising above 2%. His remarks are therefore unlikely to reverse current rate-hike expectations and could potentially reinforce expectations of a faster pace of tightening. A 50bp hike at the September meeting nevertheless appears unlikely, despite some recent speculation. Ueda said on the morning of 2 September that developments in the economy and prices since the previous meeting at the end of July had been broadly in line with the BOJ's outlook. The Bank is therefore unlikely to see a need both to shorten the interval between hikes and increase the size of the next move. Some communication aimed specifically at tempering expectations of a larger hike remains possible.

Fed rate-hike expectations also driving USD/JPY

Dollar weakness also played an important role in the USD/JPY's decline this week. Expectations of a rate hike at the FOMC meeting the week after next, which had recovered following Fed Chair Kevin Warsh's Jackson Hole remarks, have gradually receded. The Beige Book released ahead of the FOMC meeting offered a slightly weaker assessment of economic activity than the previous report, while its assessment of prices was also less hawkish than the July FOMC statement. New York Fed President John Williams, who spoke this week, pointed to slowing inflation and argued that the current policy rate remained appropriate. Meanwhile, Fed Governor Christopher Waller said he would support leaving rates unchanged if next week's CPI and other inflation data showed further improvement. His comments are particularly notable given his reputation as a hawk. With these comments from Fed officials weighing on expectations of a hike, attention is now focused on both the upcoming jobs report and the CPI due on 11 September. A weak jobs report could intensify downward pressure on the dollar and push the USD/JPY below 155, which has been viewed as an important level since the intervention during the Golden Week holidays. The reverse also holds. If the upcoming data strengthen expectations of a rate hike, some of the recent dollar selling could unwind.

Watch moves by the authorities closely

Vice Finance Minister for International Affairs Atsushi Mimura said the authorities remain on a state of high alert even amid the yen's recent appreciation. If the USD/JPY breaks below 155, the medium-term focus could shift down toward 150. Against that backdrop, developments on the policy front will also warrant close attention.

Forecast range

USD/JPY: 153.00 ~ 158.00
